ABOUT

- Tassie Yang is a Minneapolis-based Hmong shaman and senior strategic risk analyst who has spent more than 20 years building a corporate career while balancing a demanding spiritual life. She proudly lives between two worlds — corporate professional by day and shaman by night.
- Raised in a large Hmong family and originally brought up in a Lutheran household, Tassie says spirituality wasn't a major part of her early life. Looking back, however, she believes the signs were always there. At five years old, after breaking both wrists (and they were later healed through a spiritual intervention), she says her shamanic awakening had already begun.
- As a child, Tassie says she regularly saw spirits, spoke in unfamiliar languages, and experienced unexplained encounters that she later understood as spirit channeling. Years later, while beginning her career at a bank, older Hmong coworkers unexpectedly became the people who first recognized her abilities.
- Today, Tassie works as a Hmong shaman specializing in spirit work, black magic, ancestral issues, healing, and fortune telling. She also performs love and pregnancy readings, helping clients understand future relationships and life paths while reminding them that timing matters.
- Tassie frequently travels for ceremonies and shaman work, often carrying bells, ritual tools, and even animal remains used in ceremonies. She jokes that despite flying with swords, bones, and animal jaws in her luggage, TSA has somehow never stopped her.
- For Tassie, joining the show is deeply personal. As a proud Hmong woman, she wants to introduce more people to Hmong culture and show others navigating identity that they can fully embrace every part of who they are.
